Customer Reviews

This is the first book in Katharine Ashe's Falcon Club Series and it's a sizzler. Leam Blackwood, heir to a Scottish dukedom is weary after spending several years as an agent of the Falcon Club - a group of individuals who search and find "lost" people - mostly of the aristocracy. He has plans to leave the Falcon Club, return to Scotland and take up his place at his estate where his young son,

Jamie, and sisters live. To say he's been running would be an understatement. He definitely has a past that has contributed to wounds in his soul somehow related to his dead wife and dead brother. While on an assignment at a ball in London, he is, as usual, in his rougher clothing and speaking with a thick Scottish brogue when he makes eye contact with the lovely Kitty Sevege. It's apparent after the story gets going that he's heard of Kitty and her less than stellar reputation, yet manages with one look to cause her soul to be lifted up and change the course of her life. Three years have passed since that night and Kitty has made decisions that have affected her life and her country for the better. And, yet, she's still not fulfilled. She hungers for a full life that might have included a loving husband and children. But... she knows the decisions she's made in her past have contributed to her ruination, so doubts her desires will ever be fulfilled. At the most she can hope to live vicariously through her brother, Alex's family, be an aunt, but perhaps never a mother. One snowy night, she's traveling with her friend, Emily, to Emily's home when they become stranded at an inn - yes, snowbound. Guess who happens to be stranded at the same inn? You got it - Leam Blackwood and Wyn Yale of the Falcon Club.
